Immeasurable Gold

Imagination and knowledge—one evolves into the other, always dependent on perspective. Both faculties, however, retain their value when all else is no more.

Content Cohesion

Structures are not always destructive of nature; when their design and construction respect the natural environment, human structures can offer another perspective.

Change of Movement

As the forms of nature advise us, movement cannot always proceed in a straight line. We have to know when to alter course in order to grow even when the challenges are invisible to others.

Immediacy

Toiling away, reaching to fulfill our desires and with a need for immediate gratification, we neglect to look at how the actions of others affect us and what toll we really face.

Innerworkings

When we take the time to experience what's really there, whether by looking more closely or by taking a step back, we discover an unexpected reality.
